Jamie,

For the Turner plant, the only "enforceable" application due date is April 14, 2014. Any submission before that date is entirely your option. It is my understanding that you would like to get the future effective, expiration and application renewal dates to be the same as your permits in the same year. I still need to work out some issues with the rule to allow us to give a non-Acid Rain facility a future effective date beyond the 55th day following EPA's proposed permit review. According to the statute, EPA gets 45 days to review a proposed permit. If they do not object, then the proposed permit becomes a final permit on day 55 (to allow for mailing time if transmitting paper copies). There is an exception for permits that contain acid rain units that allows those permits to be issued with a future effective date so we can make them all effective on January 1st of each renewal cycle. Worst case, we may need to ask you to submit Turner a little later than May 20 or we may need to sit on it at different stages of processing. I'll figure something out that will make this work for you. Until then, don't worry about trying to meet the April 12, 2013 renewal application due date mentioned in Joe's email to you yesterday.

If you have any questions, please do not hesitate to contact me.

Subject: RE: Title V Air Operation Permits Renewal

Joe, since we are voluntarily electing to advance the renewal of these permits, we would like to change the effective date for the renewed Turner Plant permit from November 23rd (2014, based on current permit expiration date and/or potentially November 23rd, 2013 for the proposed advance permit renewal) to January 1, 2014 for this advanced renewal of the permit. This revision would still be well in advance of the current expiration date. We would also like to revise the advanced renewal application submittal date for the Turner Plant application to be May 20th, 2013 (to coincide with the January 1, 2014 date). This will allow for more consistency in the start/end dates of our Title V permits and application submittal dates, as well as provide us (and our consultants) a little more time to prepare the advanced application submittal for the Turner Plant.

Please let me know quickly if this change is acceptable to the Department, as we are currently preparing RFP's to consultants to assist in preparing these renewal applications.

Thanks.
